

March 2017

Dear Clients and Friends of the Firm,

We are writing to share some exciting news. Beginning April 1, 2017, Lewis Baach will operate worldwide under the name Lewis Baach Kaufmann Middlemiss. We are adopting the name to signal the unification of our offices and practices under a single brand, and to celebrate our growth over the last 20 years and our success as a global firm. To our sophisticated international litigation and insurance practices, we have added expertise from former prosecutors and in-house compliance and investigation specialists to extend our range and add a peerless white collar defense, internal investigations and compliance practice. In addition, our New York office has added a cutting-edge intellectual property practice, providing skilled litigation resources in the realms of technology and patent law. The new practices of our New York office have been nurtured by Adam S. Kaufmann and Arthur D. Middlemiss, and we are pleased to highlight the service and expertise that makes our firm distinctive by refreshing our brand and our logo to add their names.

We of course remain the same principled, resourceful, and diverse firm that we have been for the last two decades. We do not strive to be all things to all people. Rather, we will continue to serve our clients who value direct access to experienced hands-on litigators and wise counselors. For our clients, we are there at the first sign of trouble, and we are there when cases end and problems are solved. We remain committed to working together and delivering on that promise.

Our firm culture remains firmly rooted in traditional professional values. Stated simply, we trust our clients, our own judgment and each other. We practice law in a setting where trust, personal care and excellence define success for our clients and ourselves.

In service to our clients, we will continue to provide a more meaningful level of continuity and stability than can be found with most of our peers. As Lewis Baach Kaufmann Middlemiss, we will continue to demonstrate commitment to our clients, our values and each other, every day.
